

CHIEF BURROWS: Probably the same philosophy I have for the force I have for myself as a person. My philosophies on police work are that I believe in a democratic leadership; I believe in having staff meetings where everyone has one vote, including the chief; that I try to vote last so that no one's vote is influenced by mine; I believe we are part of the community, not a part from the community. As a man, I believe in being compassionate, and self discipline is necessary. I try not to be prejudiced, and I don't think that I have any strong biases. I enjoy being alone occasionally; I like the chance to reflect on things, I feel it's necessary to do that. I have a poem on my desk called "If" by Rudyard Kipling, and it says a lot for a police officer or man to follow. One of my philosophies certainly is to think broad — in broader terms than a lot of people. I am interested in world affairs and I feel frustrated many times, because there isn't enough I can do to help some of the world problems.
