Career change

As a municipal politician, former Ward 4 city councillor Larry Taylor spent a lot of time waiting for action from Queen's Park. Life in the private sector isn't that much different, it seems. Taylor recently completed the course to become a real estate agent, passing with an average of over 90 per cent. But he's been waiting for two weeks for the red tape at Queen's Park to spew out his official licence.

Taylor will be working for the National Real Estate Service office at 92 Lakeshore Rd. E. in Port Credit. He already has several deals he expects to consummate shortly after he's officially in business.

As for politics, Taylor says he hasn't missed those long and sometimes rancorous meetings at city hall at all. But he admits he does miss the "problem-solving" for constituents that goes with the territory.

As for his future, Taylor says he won't be making any political statements until after 1990. But he adds that he hasn't retired from politics. "I'm just taking a sabbatical." That non-political statement has a certain familiar ring to it, doesn't it?
